The river continues its gradual decline here, and is failing at all points above. Cold weather has again set in, too, to add to the already henvy burden of the steamboatmen, and the last hair—to break the camel's back—is the announcement made last night that the lee had become so heavy at St. Louis that boats had been coupelled to defer their departures, also that upward-bound boats had been forced to the bank to avoid being crushed. This, in connection with the fact that there is scant seven feet above here to Cairo, and from there up only three feet ten inches, is decidedly encouraging—over the left—and will necessarily compel a number of boats togo into winter quarters.
